I have a script that creates a working copy for me, performs some changes, and then checks out the whole working copy. I do this because I'm running into a bug that is only present on the local machine and not the upstream server. Somehow, the subversion command line program is figuring out that the working copy is out of date, and therefore checks it out. Is there some way I can configure subversion to not check out the working copy, but instead simply copy an updated version to it? A: If you're using the subversion client scripts, you can use `svn switch --depth (or Depth(s) where (s) is the number of levels of depth you want to switch), it will switch back to the selected working copy without performing any checkout. Posted January 18, 2018 at 2:04 am Admittedly, Rick's speech was somewhat lacking in the delivery department, and in an effort to rectify that, I gave him some practice. Anyway, I suspect the intent of the whole gag was to do this: So, yeah, want to know why she's doing this? Her name is Gypsy! Grape Jelly Gypsy? I know I already said this, but keeping in mind I'm a sucker for these sorts of jokes, the girl I am talking about is called Gypsy, and she's a character in Overwatch. ZETA HER NAME IS!!! Hope you enjoyed that one. I'd also like to add that this was an honest mistake on my part, as ZETA was by far the easiest to draw of all the characters I wanted to address. And, they're learning about Gypsy, I suppose. --- Oh, and, uh, I'm glad you liked the last joke. I was rather surprised I didn't get more than a few comments, and apparently I did get some meaningful ones. 6.C7.C8.C9.C10.C11.C12.C13.C14.C15.C16.C17.C18.C`
